MORE MURDER DONE

Upholds Its Title as the Wickedest Street in the Entire Civilized World.

WHERE JACK THE RIPPER SLEW

In the Heart of the District From Which Dickens Drew His Famous Villain, Bill Sykes.

London, Aug. 10.-London's police force has had its attention called to Dorset street the wickedest street in the civilized work -by an atrocious murder. The victim was a woman, an unfortunate girl named Austen. The murderer is "unknown," as are most of the murderers of Dorset streetunknown so far as the legal authorities are concerned-but known, honored and sheltered by his fellow-denizers of Dorset street. Dorset street is in Spitalfields, that crime crowded section of London in which Dickens's Bill Sykes lived and murdered his faithful Nancy. The Whitechapel District is hard by, and in the two districts "Jack the Ripper" made himself world famous by his unparalleled series of beastly crime. Dorset street is nothing more than an alley-narrow, crowded, unclean. Facing it are fifty-four houses, each of them a house of crime and criminals, each of them a lar branch of crime. In the rivalry pre-eminence in criminal annals it has gained the right to change names with Blood alley, which leads out of it. There are streets in Cairo and in the Farther East that doubtless surpass Dorset street. in deprayity, but for sheer, downright bru-tality and bloodshed this lane takes the lead.

Where Murder Is an Incident.

Here, rearing their heads above the squalid cottages common to the street, are a dozen of the choicest breeding-places of crimethe cheap, ask-no-questions lodging-house made up of a hundred or more wretched cubicles, in one of which the latest murdered victim was found. Here flourished as a greater menace to morals than in any other section of London the demoralizing traffic known as the "furnished-room sys traffic known as the "furnished-room system." Here scores of adult thieves, coiners and housebreakers have their lairs, and here, too, half a dozen Fagins train up mere children, boys and girls alike, in the art of rifiling pockets.

But more revolting than the worst of these conditions is the street's long and black record of murder and assault, Dorset street was right in the center of the "Ripper" district, and it was in a tiny, unkempt four-room cottage here that the last of his victims was found dead and indescribably mangled. The wretched home, which will never cease to be associated with the crime, opens on a recking passakeway, dubbed, from the countless tragedies of which it has been the scene, "Blood alley." Of the cheap apartment-house which bounds the alley on the other side it is darkly whispered that a murder has taken place in every room. The lodging-house, No. 35, where the most recent atractity was perpetrated, has a record only a shade less ghastly, and the inhabitants of the neigh-northood will tell you freely that there are few houses in the street where at least one killing has not occurred.

Children of the Street.

In the light of such a history it is not surprising to find both the police and the few respectable members of the debased community calloused to affrays which end

"It isn't every night," said a police cor "It isn't every night," said a police constable, "but it's night after night that murders and outrages happen here."

The men die, stabbed in drunken brawis; the women, like annie Austen the other night, at the hands of brutes only a shade more depraved than they themselves. "Bashings," the knocking down of a stranger in the alley in broad daylight that his pockets may be emptied and any attractive part of his clothing stolen, are too common even to be noticed.

It is a significant comment upon the aw-even to be noticed.

It is a significant comment upon the awful record of crime that mounts up in the course of a year that Scotland Yard refuses to make public the statistics of Dorset street, whereas it gives out those of other localities.

"In Dorset street not long ago," wrote a Church of England clergyman who has known conditions there for years, "children gaze upon the brutal fight and the bruised face without emotion, and I have seen a child at play upon a floor still red with its murdered mother's blood. Yells and curses that would terrify most men and women scarcely disturb the children's play. Many of the single rooms in the 5-cent lodging-houses are occupied by boys and girls of not more than 12 or it, waifs who have been lured away from their homes by Dorset street Fagins and padroned with tales of the freer life to be attained as soon as the art of 'The Dodger' is mastered. The men and women of Dorset street are such boys and girls grown up."

Who Own the Housest

If practical reformers could have had their way Dorzet street would have been wiped out. Almost every charitable society wiped out. Almost every charitable society in London has attempted its recue, and one and all admit that the only remedy lies in rebuilding the whole place. To approach the people themselves is hopsless-change is what they want least-the only other way would be to persuade the men who possess the freeholds of the dens of vice to purge them, but remarkable as it seems, it is practically impossible to discover who these freeholders are. It is known that many of them are men of wealth and fair fame, living in fashionable quarters of London, but all those who have attempted to unmask their exact identity have been folied at every step.

their exact identity have been foiled at every step.

The rents are collected by an agent, sometimes a woman, living in the neighborhood, but he or she has no idea into whose coffers the rents eventually find their way, her remittances being made to some firm of solicitors or estate agents. "not instructed to reveal the name of their principal."

And even if that smug individual can be tracked down, ten chances to one he would prove to be merely a lessee and the identity of the freeholder would be as much a mystery as ever.

of the freeholder would be as much a mystery as ever.

At different times organized philanthropy has appropriated as much as $250,000 to demolish and rebuild Dorset street, and on each occasion their campaigns have come to nothing, simply on account of the delicate reticence of the aristocratic personages, part of whose incomes is derived from the blackest sink in London.

In Notorious "Blood Alley."

The amount of public attention which the Austen murder has drawn to the street has excited its denizens considerably more than the mere crime itself, as a common enough would have done. I was there day, with a photographer. From the mo lane we were hemmed in on every side by a swarm of men, women and children, as warm of men. women and children, all ragged, dirty and unkempt, who seemed to have risen out of the ground, but who had really been disgorged from countless reeking passageways on both sides of the street.

With the exception of a few hard-faced men and women who scowled ominously the crowd at first seemed anxious only to have its picture taken and to be made acquainted with the inmost workings of the camera, and a picture showing the entrance to "Blood alley" was secured with no greater difficulty than was presented by the frantic efforts of ragged urchins to get in the photograph.

It was when we entered the ill-famed alley that active trouble began. From a door of a building on the left of the passage way there emerged, or rather charged, a tall and evil-faced woman, who rushed up and poured upon the photographer such a shower of obscene invectives as it is given to few men outside a London slum to hear. "Yer impudent dog," this was the mildest of her epithets, "you just dare to snap that thing in this alley and I'll tear yer not too vague intention by shaking under the stranger's nose a skinny fist adorned with long, dirty and particularly threatening nails.

any household in the street out of doors, consequently she queens it there, and her rule is no light one. But besides her profession of rent collector, Mrs. McCarthy manages one of the largest "cubicle" lodging-houses in Dorset street. Nor is the extent of this building, from which she emerged to strike terror to the heart of the visitor, its chief claim to renown, for this is the notorious place of which it is add that a murder has been committed in every room.

Naturally, under these embarrassing circumstances, Mrs. McCarthy was jealous of the fair fame of her property.

"The impudence of 'im?" she shricked to her sympathetic audience, "comin' down here to take is bloody pictures, just as if the place hadn't a bad name emough aiready. Git out with yer, now, before I maul yer?"

Mrs. McCarthy's wrath stirred up her baffle the invaders who had aroused the anger of their sovereign lady. They swarmed in a solid phainx between the photographer and whatever part of the district they saw he was bent on picturins, and their efforts would have prevented a picture of No. 5, the lodging-house where the most recent murder took place, had not an athletic policeman appeared opportunely and succeeded in forcing the surging crowd back for an instant, or long enough for a hasty snap shot to be made.

Most conspicuous of any of the crowd was a man of about 2, attired in the ordinary coster garb, cap in hand, and driv neckcloth taking the place of collar and cravat. He seemed even tougher than the other. Just behind his left ar stretched a long still-bleeding mash. He growled assent to a request that he allow his picture to depths of "Blood Alley," where he has his habitation.

The Police Constable had stood a few paces away, watching the last performance with an odd look of interest, and when the "subject" had made his exit he whispered: "You're in luck. You've photographed the most notorious character in Dorset street. That was Billy Myers, who has been tried for murder twice and convicted of at least a dozen lesser crimes. He was accused of killing 'Black Alf.' in the hogdeids of Kent, two years ago, and before that, of the murder of 'Fishy Jack,' right here in Dorset street. The men were stabled in the abdomen, and Myers was acquitted in each instance only on account of a lack of con-clusive evidence. I don't believe he has ever been photographed of his own free will before."

Mra Braford, it is alleged, would get the signature of Mr. Bradford to a check and would then fill in the amount she wanted. Finally she cashed a check at the First National Bank for E.M. and went to the same bank this morning and presented another check for Fift. The cashier refused to honor it until Bradford was notified.

A messenger was sent to the country home, and when Bradford was told of the amounts his wife had been drawing he nearly fainted, and ordered the police to arrest Mrs. Bradford. She was found at her home in the city and taken to the police station on the charge of raising checks.
